Homologous beta2-glycoprotein I-specific autoantibodies in sera of patients with aSEB- and SEB-induced neonatal meningitis. Many patients with Staphylococcal sepsis with exotoxins show specific autoantibodies that can be useful for the diagnosis of staphylococcal intoxication. However, these IgG antibodies are different from the anti-phosphocholine IgM autoantibodies that are also associated with staphylococcal intoxication. Thus, it is unclear how these two different antibodies contribute to the pathophysiology of aSEB- and SEB-induced neonatal meningitis. We analyzed serum samples from five aSEB and seven SEB patients. Serum samples were tested for the presence of anti-beta2-glycoprotein I (beta2GPI) IgM and IgG autoantibodies by enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay (ELISA). The specificity of the anti-beta2GPI IgG antibodies was determined by immunoblot analysis. The epitopes recognized by these antibodies were determined using synthetic peptides. Anti-beta2GPI IgM was detected in the patients with aSEB and SEB intoxication, whereas beta2GPI-specific IgG was detected only in patients with SEB intoxication. The IgG autoantibodies are directed against the central region of beta2GPI (position 58-84) but not against the N-terminal (position 1-57) or the C-terminal region (position 102-125). In addition, anti-beta2GPI IgG-positive sera of aSEB and SEB patients did not contain anti-phosphocholine IgM antibodies. Our results demonstrate that aSEB- and SEB-induced neonatal meningitis have different pathophysiologies and that the beta2GPI-specific autoantibodies are not merely markers of an active type of immune response that contributes to neonatal bacterial meningitis.
