What's new in Tiger Fighter 1931 Sunset MP028:

The USAAC added the “C” to the original Tigers of the 79th Pursuit Squadron name after 1933, and all Minnesota-based squadrons went through a transition as well. Even though the original “H”-equipped squadrons never existed, they still flew the “H”-marked aircraft. The two-seat H-15-A “Tiger Fighter” was a good-looking airplane; sloping wings made an interesting mêlée of the angles of attack. To sustain a wing at high level, the R-3 was longer than any other mass-produced American aircraft, and it could rise above or dive below the opposition, unlike its twin-engined cousin the F-5; with the R-3 at low speed they could close the spaces they needed to work over by sheer reach. In 1931 Don Taylor piloted a single-engine version of the R-3 to a world airspeed record of 451.871 miles per hour. He took this plane up to 33,900 feet and back down to 5,000 feet; the last part of the total laps took a little over 20 seconds. To beat this record, the F-8 high-level fighter had to fly faster than 2,124 mph. Though the R-3 was capable of excess speed, other planes were spending more time at relatively slow speeds. In July 1931 Taylor took the R-3 no higher than 3,000 feet as he flew over the hills at the Willow Grove Airport in Pennsylvania. The temperature inside the cockpit had fallen to 50 degrees below zero. Taylor was in the habit of starting, finishing, refueling, and setting up stations for the next flight at Willow Grove. Installed in the top left wing was a wireless radio and while on the ground the pilot kept an ear glued to the Westinghouse system; each time he heard an air band signal, he noted the time and recorded it on special writing paper. His first surprise was that the temperature recorder read negative 300 degrees below zero. Later in the flight he realized he could hear no radio operator and that he was completely isolated; he had not pumped up the cabin pressure. He abandoned the original plan to fly and flew at lower altitudes trying to reach a populated area where he could top up. He encountered snow fields just as visibility lessened, and wind bursts kept him on the ground. He went through a period of strong gusts, but finally one
