Using md5 version is safer and faster. In some cases the mds5 is different from the exact file size. If you want a more stable source of the file, please use the checksum value to download it. If your download did not start within 5 minutes, please try to reload this page. If you have a very slow connection or you are on a very crowded server try to change your server. You can do it by clicking on your address bar and press SHIFT+REFRESH:[Spectral and spatial analysis of gray matter in Alzheimer's disease]. The understanding of the pathogenesis of the Alzheimer's disease and the development of new therapies require a large number of experiments which require the integration of results obtained from different sources. The integration of histological data with those obtained from other techniques (electrical and magnetic resonance) is not a simple task. Our approach to this problem is based in the spectral and spatial analysis of the gray matter. The activation coefficients of the spectra and the image of the spatial variance have been introduced. The use of an artificial neural network, which includes the spectral and spatial analysis techniques, is proposed. The artificial network is used to predict the biopsy probabilities from the Alzheimer's disease diagnosis.Q: Is there any way to know server load balancing pools? I just recently started working at my current company and we currently have a load balanced web server setup. The problem is, we are using webmin to configure things so I can't seem to check what pools the server is in. Is there any way to determine that? We are using two servers with webmin configured like this: [root@homb3 Webmin]# cat /etc/webmin/miniserv.conf listen = 1.2.3.4 listen = 2.3.4.5 listen = 3.4.5.6 [root@homb3 Webmin]# cat /etc/webmin/miniserv_sample.conf listen = 1.2.3.4 listen = 2.3.4.5 A: If you've got access to the load balancer itself, it should be possible to get the pool names through the raw routing configuration. Other than that, no, you'll need to have access to the load balancer's configuration. Q
