The Tartarus Key is inspired by classic game aesthetics and a desire to bring the endorphin rush of being trapped by horror into a reality that is both scary and lighthearted. The idea is to make a game that will get under your skin and terrify you, but also to make a good light-hearted game to capture the appeal of those games. The inspiration for The Tartarus Key came from a few types of games that I had played, but also the weird and wonderful games and games with atmosphere that I recall playing as a kid. Happy Halloween, and don't forget to Stay Smart! Inspired by the look and feel of classic horror games, The Tartarus Key serves up a mystery filled with twists and turns, and more than a few deadly surprises. . A report by John Darnielle (NOTE: To play any of the songs on the album, you'll need headphones and an MP3 device, for which you'll likely need to seek out your local video store. The theme of the album is that of computer and Internet junkies abandoned by their technology, wandering through a ruined tech village in Appalachia, looking for the miracle of a place to connect — or, more simply, the miracle of a place that needs you.) * * * Robert was there on Melville Street, shivering and his head shaved, staring through the windows of the bookstore. It was a Barnes & Noble, one of those places where the children of New York City herd all their used e-books to. The square that surrounded it was mostly full of adult men deep in conversation, their epaulets and gold chains warning them to keep their voices down. The store had a bookshop, a used books section, and a fire extinguisher behind the very first cash register. But the children's section was empty. They pulled out their books as they approached the cash register, paying little heed to the path of the words. Robert played the musician's role and made a lot of exasperated noises while saying nothing at all. On the cover of his book it said "End of the World" and at the time he was shopping there was still a chance there was something in it about the status of the world. He asked if they had a place to stay. The man looked at him. "Do you prefer not to know?" "I meant in this store," Robert said. "Where do you put the computers?" "They're behind the shelving," the man said. "You can access them from there." Robert struggled to find a place to fit down in the books. He left a jacket on the counter and entered the square. There were a couple thousand people standing around talking quietly in the cold. The band around their necks looked like it had been painted on, and the colors weren't right to correspond with any of their outfits. He found a woman in a bright green dress with a heavy wrap around her shoulders, nearly lost in it. He asked her if she knew where the bookstore was, and when he explained what
