Creating & Importing Images Depending on what you are doing, the first thing you should do is select your image(s). If you can export into JPEG, it's better to use JPEG because it's more versatile and smaller. If you are using a RAW image, you can edit it and save it as JPEG after adjusting your settings. Photoshop Elements lets you import images from a memory card directly into the computer or from a USB drive. Once the image is inside your computer, you can use the Load or Save dialog to select a directory and file name. Image Type Most of the things you'll need to set will be found in the Preferences window, which you can open by clicking the File menu > Preferences. Make sure that the File Type option is set to JPG or JPEG, and the Image Size is set to the size that you want, which you can find in the Image Size menu. You may have to scroll down to see this option. If the information doesn't show, restart Photoshop Elements. Photo Mode Depending on what you are using the images for, you may want to select one of four Photo Modes. For general use, the best option is to use the Auto Photo Mode. It will choose the best option for the camera. For cropping, if you are only cropping the image, select the Crop Image. If you are editing a RAW file, select the Basic Photo Mode, which provides fewer options than the full-featured Photo Mode. The Basic Photo Mode has fewer filters, but it also has fewer options for adjusting and manipulating the image. To use the Basic Photo Mode, first open the file, then use the Rectangle/Straighten tool. This tool appears in the toolbox. You can find the Rectangle/Straighten tool in the toolbox. After selecting it, click to create a rectangular selection. You can click where you want to make the corner of the rectangular selection, and it will draw a dotted line to mark where you want to make a corner. You can select the dotted line with the Direct Selection tool or press the R key. When you are finished with the Rectangle/Straighten tool, use the

The drop in demand for mortgage credit "is an alarming trend and reflects the credit markets uncertainty," the Bank of England said in a statement in June. A drop in mortgage credit meant less money was loaned out and the sector shrunk, the statement said. Yet with the end of the financial crisis in sight, the fall in the number of outstanding loans is creating its own uncertainty. Banks are pushing their borrowers to borrow more, which makes the overall number of loans smaller. The other effect of the decline in mortgage credit is the way this money is used. According to House Price Index, a survey carried out by GPI Insights, 75% of mortgage borrowers are taking out a higher amount of their loan than last year. Roughly half that amount is being used for mortgage payments. The Bank of England believes that the great majority of people will pay off their loans. "The process of restructuring debt flows through all of the critical financial markets, and it is in these markets that the main impact on the financial system will be felt in coming months," the Bank of England said. Better than 50% The scale of mortgage loans in the UK is unknown. The last survey, carried out by GPI Insights in 2014, found that the number of outstanding mortgages (those at least three months past due) had hit 68,000 (a decline of 8,000 since 2011). According to the Bank of England, 50% of all mortgage loans outstanding are better than those of last year. More than a third are paid off, while around 30% are being used for mortgage payments. While most loans are the same amount as last year, the value of outstanding debt also rose, the Bank of England found. At the end of the third quarter, 41% of borrowers who took out a loan in the last quarter had an outstanding balance of £1,000 or more. While this number has dropped slightly in the fourth quarter of the year, it has risen substantially compared to a year ago. This level of risk could soon increase, said the Bank of England. In order to reduce the amount of risk, the Bank is reducing the amount of available credit.
