The 'justification of war' in classical antiquity View/Open Date Format Metadata Abstract

In this paper, I explore the various rationales for war found in the classical sources, a time when the ancient Greeks and Romans saw no fundamental distinction between war and peace. I begin by examining the beginnings of the classical tradition, before commenting on the qualities of ancient writers, while then moving on to the politics of antiquity. I will then examine the rationale for war in classical antiquity, before looking at the views of individual classical thinkers, the scope of just wars, the rights and wrongs of war, and finally the impact of the classical tradition on modern thinking./
