The determination of protein structure and function is inseparably bound to the application of unnatural amino acids and l-amino acids whose structures deviate from nature. Over the past decades, an increasing amount of biocatalysis and chemoenzymatic methods, which are applied for this purpose, have been described. In addition to their applicability as biocatalytic tool, these methods allow the design and synthesis of unnatural amino acids based on the biological properties and reactivity of the building blocks. This minireview presents biocatalysis and chemoenzymatic approaches to the synthesis of unnatural amino acids.Q: What should I do when a user no longer uses the tool? I've written a matlab toolbox for my users, this is a plugin for a large application, the entire application is running matlab using a vb script wrapper for the gui. The users are part of a large distributed project, there has been other development projects that has involved heavy use of this toolbox. The toolbox has been widely used for extended periods. The main problem is the tool is now dead. What is the best way to handle this? I'm thinking of just posting it on the github if possible with a note on the project that says "last update in 2010". Should I just submit the source code to the project on github and request that the project link to it from the project home page or will the users think I'm just being lazy? A: As usual, the answer depends a lot on context, so lets first look at some of the cases to handle it in: Release a relic Simply release a version with a hint about the usage. In your case, this version might be the last version of the toolbox. Backport fixes or other changes Depending on the amount of work it would have been worthwhile to backport fixes. So you have to check if the changes
