----- The goal of the program is to remove the components you don't need, in order to save space or increase the performance of the operating system. The application's features are separated into three main categories. First of all, there's the Add/Remove Components tab. Here you can get rid of components that you do not use; this section also allows you to add various system features. The "Windows File Protection" tab lets the user customize their operating system, that is, when it's disabled. It is recommended to enable it after the customization procedure. The "Shrink" section can come in really handy if you want to reduce the disk space occupied by Windows. You can use this option if you want to remove outdated updates or security hot fixes, as in some cases they may linger on the disk although their presence does nothing to improve performance or security. It would be more practical to use this feature if you are going to use your computer as a wireless network, since it will eliminate a few data errors. The "Wireless" tab also lets you remove or replace the antenna for wireless devices, such as the built-in Bluetooth card. You can enable or disable the Bluetooth support that the adapter has. As we know, Bluetooth works on your PC via the motherboard's built-in Bluetooth adapter, so if you disable this support, you will disable the Bluetooth. The "Stores" tab lets you remove the "Settings" option, and if you don't use it, you can get rid of it, as well. The other functions of this section are usually used only by IT technicians. The "Internet" tab lets you remove the built-in browser to install any other browser. The default is Internet Explorer, but
