Uber is partnering with the city to launch the first bike-share program that can be used by anyone, even those without a subscription, and the first to be part of New York City's current cycle-share system. Ride bikes at no cost The service, called NYC Wheel, will launch in mid-July and be available in five boroughs of New York City. People can use it to get around, pick up friends and, most importantly, for free, all with the tap of a smartphone app. There will be 150 stations throughout the city that operate like any other bike-share station. A smartphone app, called Fitbit, will help commuters track their rides, and the company promises the "best user experience in the industry." The service will utilize the bike-share station at the New York Wheel, a giant Ferris wheel that is part of a mixed-use complex in the Hudson Yards neighborhood of Manhattan. The program will be a collaboration between Uber and bike-share provider Motivate, with the New York City Economic Development Corporation (EDC) acting as an equity investor. Uber will act as the operator and provide bikes, while Motivate will manage the rental business and provide the station equipment. Tackling traffic congestion The launch is timed for the start of the summer travel season in the city, when more people will be making their way to the many beaches and outdoor restaurants in the New York area. Ride hailing services like Uber already make it easy for people to book a trip from home to a city block party in Manhattan or from one part of the city to another, but with private companies providing the service and a city-run program, they can keep money in the city instead of abroad, making their services particularly attractive to local businesses that want to tap into the region's growing tourism industry. "This new public-private partnership is a major milestone for the bike-share industry," said Anthony Lomax, the EDC president and CEO, in a statement. "By providing access to two billion trips annually, this program will bring hundreds of thousands of new bike trips to the streets of New York City, moving more people more
